Newel R. Farnham has sold his farm, the old-time Amasa Worthington and later the Clark W. Farnham farm, to Murdo McLeod. Mr. Farnham tells us that his grandfather, on his mother's side, Amasa Worthington, and his wife came here to this farm in an early day, on horseback, from Connecticut. Their popular riding sticks were stuck in the ground after reaching here and grew into the Lombardy poplars, we think yet to be seen, near the dwelling house. "Uncle Amasa" Worthington, as he was familiarly called, was a pioneer in Methodism here, and if the full history of his home could be written now we think it tell in various ways for the furtherance of Methodism here. We think the well-known campmeetings here of 60 years ago were held on his farm. Clark W. Farnham, the second owner of the place, married a daughter of Mr. Worthington, and the late Robert Seaver married another daughter. A lady member of the Methodist church here tells us that as a girl she remembers Mr. Worthington found it hard to sell the old farm, on which both he and his mother were born, and the home of three generations of the family.

The Advance Movement in the Retailing of Women's Apparel

The successful merchandiser of Women's Garments is always working away from the commonplace merchandise to be had. One may buy garments from a thousand different houses and still have just garments! Now, "just garments" are not good enough for a good store; and it is the good stores that buy and sell the best products.

We are always looking to woman. If she prefers our merchandise, the rest is easy. But she will not prefer our merchandise unless we can give her the best merchandise possible for the money. We can prosper only as we can satisfy our customers—and you are satisfied when we do.
